The authors proposed a three-dimensional model to assess and understand the multiple factors affecting the political participation of immigrants in the United States. First, the model posits that immigrants' political participation is determined by three dimensions: (1) individual characteristics, (2) social and political context, and (3) political participation itself. Two dimensions—individual characteristics and social and political context—lead to the third dimension, political participation. The authors' conceptualization of the individual and contextual factors is based on the literature on political participation. Empirical research has indicated that a number of individual and contextual factors are related to immigrants' political participation, such as education, income, age, gender, and duration of residence in the United States. The authors argue that these factors are related to immigrants' political participation in the United States in a similar manner to the way that they are related to immigrants' political participation in their home countries.
